I want to start by saying that I'm here to support you, and I'll do my best to explain this in a way that's easy to understand.

The doctor has taken a look at your skin and found something that might be causing some concern. The condition is called a vascular lesion.

Imagine your skin as a network of tiny roads, and these blood vessels are like the cars driving on those roads. Normally, everything runs smoothly.

There are many different types of vascular lesions, but some of them can be caused by things like injury, infection, or even genetics.

Now, I know this might sound a bit scary, but please don't worry – we're not going to jump to any conclusions just yet.

In the meantime, here are some general tips that can help you take care of your skin:

- * Keep an eye on it – if you notice anything changing or growing, let us know right away.
- * Avoid picking or scratching at it, as this can make things worse.
- * Make sure you're getting enough rest and eating a healthy diet to keep your overall health in check.

Remember, this is just a preliminary diagnosis, and we'll be doing more testing to confirm what's going on. But for now, let's focus on keeping your skin healthy.

Is there anything specific that you're worried about or would like to know more about? I'm here to listen and help you.
